Food Safety Management: Chapter 45. Nutritional Trends and Health Claims Jean-Michel Antoine
Beyond immediate assessment based on sensory and service characteristics, two main criteria drive food choice on a longer term: safety and satisfaction of needs. Needs are changing: motorization reduces human energy requirements. Industrialization increases food production, and challenges many consumers with a new question: select what to eat to add years to life. Needs are changing: for the first time there are more than 7 billion mouths on earth. People are living beyond 45 years of age: we learned how to feed growing kids and reproductive adults, we now have to learn how to feed the growing numbers of the elderly, and to feed people with chronic diseases, including the irrepressible epidemic of obesity. Diet can improve different functions, prevent or delay revolution, and even cure some diseases at least by feeding our defense and repair systems, and a recently rediscovered new organ: gut microbiota quite sensitive to probiotics. How much science is needed to support a claim? How much can we invest when food price is a major constraint? There is no simple answer, but promising progress. Along with safety, adaptation of diet and water to satisfy of needs for health is the next frontier.
